

A B O U T F A C E

Preparing Your Child For Social Interaction

Written by Dr. Kathy Kapp-Simon, Ph.D., a pediatric psychologist who currently works with the Northwestern University Cleft and Palate Institute and Anna Pileggi, Executive Director of AboutFace. This article was adapted and reprinted with permission from the 1999 Hemangiomas Booklet produced by AboutFace.

The goal for all parents is to nurture their children so that they have a positive sense of self and ultimately make a contribution to their community. To achieve this goal parents need to build self-esteem and confidence in their children. We know that children with facial differences may require additional skills to deal with the special situations that they face and this section will provide basic advice about these skills.

Identifying the Condition:

As your child grows, it will be important for him or her to understand the condition and be able to share information about it with others, particularly when you are not there. Preparing for social interaction begins at a very early age through your example as a parent. Your child will learn how to answer questions about his or her condition by watching the ways in which you respond to people. It is important for you to think about the message you want to give to your child. There will be days when you feel able to educate others through a simple explanation of your child's condition, and there will be days when you are less patient or do not have the emotional strength to deal with others' questions. It is important to have responses prepared for both situations.

When preparing responses; find words to describe your child's condition that are truthful and appropriate to your child's age. Remember that your child will be listening to what you say. For example, a simple statement that a Hemangioma is a "birthmark that has grown" may be sufficient when your child is young. As school age approaches, your child can and should learn the proper terms associated with his or her condition. This knowledge provides your child with self-confidence based on their ability to respond to and educate others. It is important that your child have a positive statement to give to avoid feeling awkward, embarrassed, or uncomfortable. Being prepared to answer questions removes the element of surprise and makes social experiences easier.

Knowledge of Personal History:

Children need to have a sense of their personal history. Making photographs available to your child as part of the family photo album are critical for helping your child accept his or her history. Children love to look at their baby pictures; these photos will document the child's appearance that has occurred with growth. Allowing your child access to the family album will provide opportunities to have discussions in a non-threatening atmosphere in which your child can ask questions about his or her condition. By including all your child's photos, you can show that you are proud of your child.

Handling Negative Social Interactions:

All children are teased for something at some time in their lives. The only difference is what they are teased about! Parents often become angry with children who tease and may want to confront their parents. Before taking action, however, it is a good idea to ask your child how he or she wants to handle the situation. Allow your child to express his or her feelings to you. Questions to consider with your child include the following: Who did the teasing? Was it a friend, an acquaintance, a stranger, or a school bully? What was your child teased about? Was it a mean comment, a joke that went bad, or a remark based on a lack of understanding?

A B O U T F A C E

After looking at these factors, you and your child can decide how to respond to future encounters. Some choices include making a good-natured joke, providing information, or turning away from the person doing the teasing and actively engaging in positive interaction with other peers or friends. Whatever the response, your child should do it with confidence reflected in body language and tone of voice. Parents can practice these strategies with their child. However, if teasing continues to be a concern, it may be helpful to involve the other children's parents, a teacher, or a health care professional. Seek guidance from the professionals on your child's craniofacial team, who will be able to provide information specific to your child's situation, which is beyond the scope of this resource sheet.

AboutFace is a national charitable organization dedicated to helping individuals with facial differences and their families. We support individuals whose differences are present at birth or acquired as a result of disease or trauma. If you or someone you know has a facial difference and would like more information, contact AboutFace at 1-800- 665-FACE or www.aboutface.ca.

© AboutFace 2014

This resource sheet was produced by and for AboutFace. It is protected under the copyright laws and may not be published or reproduced without written authorization from AboutFace.